

UKRAINE, OR HATRED AS VIRTUE

Posted on July 1, 2023 by C.B. Forde

The conflict in the Ukraine has brought unexpected clarity to the meshwork of contradictions that bestrew the so-called "civilized." The West breathlessly presents itself as "righteous" and "good," while very little inside it can still be described as such: "whitewashed tombs" (Matthew 23:27).

For example:

- The law has been unhinged entirely from actions once deemed criminal. Children are avidly and maliciously taught sexual perversions in schools, even to the destruction of their own bodies, while actions once thought criminal are simply "reparations" and therefore never to be punished.
- Transvestitism has become a great campaign to rewrite humanity itself.
- Anti-white racism is now the "normal" Western habit of mind.
- Mass immigration has destroyed indigenous Western populations, despite the West's rhetoric of care for indigeneity.
- Deindustrialization has transitioned into defarming so that food can cease being abundant.
- The age-old anti-Catholic assumptions have expanded into a total war against the last vestiges of Christianity, the foundational moral-structure of the now atheistic West.
- Economics, once designed to sustain and expand human welfare, is now a tool to destroy it.
- Culture, which once housed the strength of Western values, is now a tool to destroy them.
- "Human rights," "freedom," "democracy" are empty phrases, repeated piously, while nothing in present-day Western society suggests that these qualities actually exist.
- The traditional understanding of technology as a helpmate of humanity has become a method for its control, and even its destruction.
- Care for nature has veered into anti-natalism and the hatred of humanity itself.
- Truth is no longer needed, since the lie serves far more important purposes and constructs.

The project of the West is no longer to expand the benefits of civilization, but to destroy civilization so that a new world may be born, in which there are only as many humans as needed. This is known as "progress" and is the very lifeblood of the West today.

A single thread unites all these progressive efforts—the lie, and the chief attribute of the lie is hatred. Those that deny the lie must be hated. One becomes virtuous in the West by proudly hating what is supposed to be hated. The government marks for the public what and who is to be hated and loved. And the people, with the help of the media-education-entertainment complex suitable adapt their emotions, and express outrage or approval as mandated. Such manipulation is no longer subtle; it is in-your-face, because the public has been lied to for so very long that they can no longer understand subtlety. They demand coarseness—the more vulgar, the better.

The conflict in Ukraine, among many other things, is one such Western construct, a glossography, where lies and hatred exquisitely intertwine. Russia is to be lied about and openly hated—because Russia is the government-approved "enemy," and dutifully all the gourmands of hatred try to outvie each other to see who can spew the vilest of hate against the "enemy." This competition has strongly united nations and populations. How do I hate thee, let me count the ways...

The examples of such pharisaical expressions are now dime-a-dozen and easily found, even in the most unexpected of places. Examples of Western Russophobia are endless, and there is little point in repeating them, from the never-ending rounds of sanctions against Russia (round 11 is now being packaged), to Zelensky of Ukraine prohibiting Russian books from being published or imported into his country, lest the purity of his nation be destroyed by contact with Russian, to some rich author canceling her own book because it was thoughtlessly, horror of horrors, set in Russia. Or, just ordinary folk letting off a bit of steam.

But the honor of uttering the foulest venom must go to Andrzej Duda, the president of Poland. Needless to say, the government of Poland specializes in fomenting rancor against Russia—it feels that this is its God-given role now in the world—to make the world realize just how beastly and evil Russians are. Such is the divine mission of Polish politicians, and they certainly revel in it.

On June 23, 2023, for example, in an interview given to a Ukrainian TV Channel (Espresso), Duda dropped these gems of wisdom:

"Russia cannot be allowed to win because it will continue to advance. This will support its imperialism. It is like a wild beast that will eat a human being. If a wild beast eats a human being, it is usually said that it should be hunted down and shot because it is used to eating human flesh. The same with Russia."

Such sphinxian knowledge Polish politicians, like him, alone possess:

"Perhaps the West does not understand this, but we know it very well." To clarify: "it" being Russia, the man-eating beast.

Just replace "it" with... say... "Israel" and see what happens, as you're hauled off to jail, in any "free" and "democratic" Western country, for hate-speech. But Russia. No problem. Say what you like. All hatred is acceptable. Knock yourself out. Your government expects you to hate Russia. If you don't—there's something seriously wrong with you, and more than likely you're a Putin agent. I won't mention the Two Minutes Hate à la 1984. Duda is the Virgil of our age, in an anti-Divine-Comedy of his own contrivance, his pansophical finger pointing out the nine-levels of depravity of the Russian beast. Quite the calling!

You see, Russia is the new "infidel" that must be routed and annihilated. Only a Russia-less world can be truly "free" and "democratic."

But before long, Duda remembered that he was the president of some country or other, and shoved in a tad of lawyer-gibberish, to give himself that air of authority:

"This is a necessary condition [killing the man-eating beast] for a successful and just end to this war. What should it be? At least in such a way as to restore the supremacy of international law. International law will be restored when Russia is pushed out of all occupied lands in Ukraine."

Murdering an entire nation is justice, and the only way this war in Ukraine can end "justly" is when Russia is killed off, like a rabid beast. What's mass murder among Western friends? It's all to restore "the supremacy of international law," after all. Nothing wrong with that at all, is there?

And then Duda catches himself, with an olive branch to any Ukrainian peacenik that might be listening to the Espresso interview (there must be such a creature, somewhere in Ukraine. Rara avis, no doubt and seldom sighted, but there must be one. A hint to birders). Duda suggests that the death-blow should not be quick and painless. Oh no. That would be anticlimactic and therefore disappointing. He has readied the scarpines for Putin. Yes, indeed:

"We must make sure that we, together with Ukraine, tire Russian society and torture Putin."

But then Duda knows a thing or two about torture, given how you get treated in Polish prisons, so that the penal system needs a regular check-up.

On a side note, in order to hate Russia properly, you also have to show excessive love for Ukraine, and especially for Zelensky. Is this why every Western leader that meets him has to hug him, and look longingly into his eyes and just hug him again. There's a lot of homoerotism going on with Zelensky; but then Zelensky is used to such affection.

This is why, Duda had to come out of the closet at last and let it all hang out:

"President Zelensky and I love each other, but we are involved in politics."

And once politics is done, look out world!

This would explain the special hugs reserved for his great love.

One can only hope that one day the good people of Poland will wake up and refuse to be led by such crackpots. But that is an awakening that needs to happen throughout the West. We're all sick and tired of our leaders. Maybe Duda was actually on to something about how to treat man-eating beasts...
